

A pair of patient lovers (Harpers portrait collection of short stories)

Excerpt: ...that the Old Testament says, and all that the New Testament says; and what does it amount to on this point? Nothing but the assurance that if we live rightly here we shall be happy in the keeping of the divine Love there. That assurance is everything to me. It isnt to me! cried the old man. We are in the keeping of the divine Love here, too, and are we happy? Are those who live rightly happy? Its because were not conditioned for happiness here; and how are we going to be conditioned differently there? We are going to suffer to all eternity through our passions, our potentialities of experience, there just as we do here. There may be other passions, other potentialities of experience, Ewbert suggested, casting about in the void. Like what? Hilbrook demanded. Ive been trying to figure it, and I cant. I should like you to try it. You cant imagine a new passion in the soul any more than you can imagine a new feature in the face. There they are: eyes, ears, nose, mouth, chin; love, hate, greed, hope, fear! You cant add to them or take away from them. The old man dropped from his defiance in an entreaty that was even more terrible to Ewbert. I wish you could. I should like to have you try. Maybe I havent been over the whole ground. Maybe theres some principle that Ive missed. He hitched his chair closer to Ewberts, and laid some tremulous fingers on the ministers sleeve. If Ive got to live forever, what have I got to live for? Well, said Ewbert, meeting him fully in his humility, let us try to make it out together. Let us try to think. Apparently, our way has brought us to a dead wall; but I believe theres light beyond it, if we can only break through. Is it really necessary that we should discover some new principle? Do we know all that love can do from our experience of it here? Have you seen a mother with her child? Hilbrook retorted. Yes, I know. But even that has some alloy of selfishness. Cant we imagine love...
